Clinical trials use different endpoints to measure treatment and diagnosis effects, yet, the classification of outcomes is not performed consistently, making comparisons across trials difficult. Our objectives were to determine rates of use of, and standards for, different types of endpoints, describe the most common classifications, and assess the quality of reported classifications. We conducted a mailed survey of endpoints in 18,524 US clinical trials published in the journals of the American Medical Association, the American Society of Clinical Oncology, the New England Journal of Medicine, and JAMA in 2005. Although the majority of trials classified outcomes in a manner that reflected their scientific intent, most used a different version of existing classification systems. The most common system used was a modified version of the five-group Mayo endpoints. Less than half of the trials reported how they classified outcomes. The quality of the existing classification systems is poor. The most common reason for classification not being reported was that authors chose not to report their results. There is opportunity to improve the consistency and quality of the process.Q: Projects that use the Microsoft Windows Azure SDK I'm developing a project that uses the Microsoft Windows Azure SDK.
