Manual analysis of multicolor data is time consuming, and it is not possible to read and edit data streams from other multispectral and multicolor flow cytometry instruments (e.g., BD FACSCanto/Guava). In addition, flow cytometry instruments with sufficient recording capacity (e.g., BD LSRFortessa) may be underutilized. To overcome these limitations, we developed FlowJ-Explorer, a web application to access and manipulate flow cytometry data. FlowJ-Explorer allows extensive editing and annotation of raw data from single and multicolor flow cytometry experiments, as well as the creation of new data files. Additionally, new features include a user-friendly interface, the ability to manually synchronize with external databases and the availability of easy-to-use plugins for major programming languages (e.g., Python, R, and Java). We anticipate that FlowJ-Explorer will allow users to perform multiplexed, functional, and genomics studies using previously underutilized flow cytometry instruments, and will further revolutionize flow cytometry data acquisition and analysis. The multicolor flow cytometry suite Since its introduction in 2005, multicolor flow cytometry has been a standard tool to study immune cell populations and the presence and function of various immune cell subtypes. The complex immune system of the human body is comprised of many
