There are twelve different factions; Eastern Roman Empire, TheÂ .Q: What is the best strategy to send a message to a dynamically spawned "children" of an object in C#? In C#, given a parent object, some of its "children" are created dynamically (as part of a message loop). The object has no reference to its childrens. At a given time, I'd like to send a "message" to each of the child objects. In the following code, you can see how this would normally be done: public class Parent { private List myObjectList = new List(); public void AddChild(MyObject obj) { myObjectList.Add(obj); } //... } public class MyObject { public MyObject(Parent childParent) { Parent parent = (Parent)childParent; //... } //... } What is the best strategy to get an event to each of the myObjects? A: Try to avoid a reference from the parent to the children, if it is an object, it can be quite handy at the beginning, but soon it becomes a maintenance nightmare. Take a look to the Event class for examples of how to implement the things you want. Q: Add a Scrollview while using Autolayout? While using autolayout, is there a way to add a scrollview to a main View while taking care of the constraints for the rest of the views in the main View? Also is there a way to remove the constraints from the scrollview viewcontroller? A: You can add a scrollview to a view if you don't have auto d0c515b9f4
